The Black Student Union has opted to not hold a special election to fill its vacant vice president position.

According to BSU President Kurt Young, a special election will not be possible because the Elections and Credentials Committee will be too busy with the upcoming SA elections.

Young said that while an interim vice president may be elected, it is more likely that the organization will wait until its regular elections after spring break.

The vice presidential spot has been vacant since Young left it to fill the void left when Oswaldo Mestre resigned the presidency in early February.

Young said the vice presidency of BSU is an important job, but was confident that the organization will run smoothly without one.

"We have a lot of hard-working people, so we will be able to function well until the regular elections," he said.
